

Editorial

The editors of the South Eastern European Journal of Public Health (SEEJPH) proudly present a collection of papers authored by young African scientists in honor of Dr. Hideyo Noguchi (1876–1928), the famous Japanese bacteriologist (see the introductory editorial information). Although the publication is in English, it also collects contributions from several francophone countries in Sub-Saharan Africa.

As the authors may go for the Hideyo Noguchi competition, we did not modify the submitted papers' content to not interfere with the selection process. However, we invite minor corrections e.g. of misspellings etc. if later detected. We are, nevertheless, highly impressed by the quality, engagement, and originality of the contributions examining the status of Universal Health Coverage in one of the most disadvantaged regions of the world, with insufficient health infrastructure and investment, aggravated by the permanent outmigration of qualified personnel and the current COVID19 pandemic.

The editors are very grateful for the permanent and effective support of Prof. Flavia Senkubuge, Chair WHO/Afro African Advisory Committee on Research and Development and President Colleges of Medicine of South Africa, Vice-President African Federation of Public Health Associations.
